Facts on the film business

A LANCASTER-BORN film-maker is returning home to nurture emerging talent in the movie directing world.

Chee Keong Cheung will take time out from working with industry giants such as Martin Scorsese in order to work with the Folly media arts organisation on a programme of activity including a free talk, a short film course and a year-long mentoring scheme.

"My story aims to illustrate how I adapted and persevered to be accepted within such a competitive and exciting industry," says Chee, who is currently working on his first two feature films.

"It aims to provide both an insight and a better understanding for those wishing to embark upon a career in the business."

The scheme will include tutorials, networking opportunities and valuable work experience on film shoots.

An evening talk will take place at 7pm this Thursday, October 14, for people interested in the scheme and course, or who want to hear more.

To book a place or for more information on the scheme and how to apply, contact Maria Lambley at Folly on 388550 or see www.folly.co.uk
